Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Water Supply of Nome Region, Seward Peninsula, Alaska The successful operation of a placer deposit depends primarily upon the water supply. Data in regard to this supply are essential to its economical development, and lack of such information in regard to the flow of streams has often caused financial failure in mining as well as in other enterprises which depend on water. For a number of years the United States Geological Survey has made in the United States systematic measurements and studies of the water supply as one of the great resources of the country. These data are now available for all of the more important streams, and are extensively used by engineers and others in problems involving water power, city water supply, irrigation, and manufacturing. During the season of 1906 the Survey extended these investigations to Alaska in order that information in regard to water supply may be available for the economical development of the placer mines and water power of that territory. The field work was carried on from June 11 to October 3. The work necessary for the preparation of this report was done under the direction of the water-resources branch, but the expenses were paid from the appropriation for the investigation of the mineral resources of Alaska. The limited funds available made it necessary to restrict the investigations to a comparatively limited area. Owing to the rich placers and extensive mining in the vicinity of Nome the work was confined to streams of that section, special attention being given to the more important of those that supply water for working the rich deposits back of Nome. The gaging stations were so...
