Not illustrated. 1892 Excerpt: .a new subject is introduced in A minor, on the words, Where warlike Judas wields his righteous sword it is first taken by the trebles, and then worked in counterpoint by the other voices, in the style of a fugue, the answers, however, being all in the same key. This second subject, though quite different in form from the first one, is perfectly consistent with it in style and expression, as a proof of which they are shortly afterwards combined, some of the voices reverting to the first phrase, while the others continue the second. The elaboration of this double subject forms the basis of the remainder of the piece; but it is interrupted by a passage in which the singers appear suddenly to remember that the discomfiture of the enemy, though a subject of exultation to themselves, is yet one of sadness to the fallen. This pathetic element in the picture is expressed by taking the word fallen piano, and, with a subdued accompaniment, repeating it, after three beats of silence, with a change of harmony, After this, the original phrase interposes, once, forte, but is again immediately followed by the piano passages more marked than before; and here the composer has used, for the third time in the Oratorio, the striking progression of which an example is given in the first chorus. It appears as if, in writing Judas Maccabaus, that progression of all others presented itself to his mind wherever he wished to...
