I do not think I could serve another master or mistress, said old John, decidedly. If so be you wanted a servant-- Then, said Mabel, you would be mine, of course; but that cannot be; and I have been thinking, that if you had a garden of your own--a nursery garden, I mean, you would be independent. - I was thinking of that myself, ma am, said old John, with a pleased expression at finding his wants divined-- and if--but I don t like to say it--there, I can t, he said, walking to the window. John was going to say, ma am, interrupted Betsy, seeing that Mabel looked puzzled, that if it would not hurt your feelings, he should like to keep on the old garden still--if he could have a cottage built where our house stood--if, that is, you do not object. Mabel checked her rising emotion, and said, cheerfully. How could I object to your keeping the dear old garden--how glad should I be to think that it was an old friend, not a stranger, who lived there. Would you now, ma am, said John, his face brightening; I could keep the old walks and the hot beds as they used to be--and twouldn t be quite such a breaking up of old times--for I have lived there so long, it seems like a home to me. I should be very glad, said Mabel, to think you were happy...
