Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Letters From South Africa Up to the Karoo! It means up from Cape Town, which is on the level of the sea, to a plateau topping the summit of Table Mountain, and maintaining throughout the extent of half a continent an elevation of from 3000 to 6000 feet. The principal climb is done in the first twelve hours of a railway journey. A train leaves Cape Town at nine in the evening. Through the night the traveller, struggling with a first experience of railway beds, which he afterwards learns to regard as quite sufficiently comfortable for sleeping purposes, hears the almost human groan and strain of the engine as it toils up the heavy way. There is even a point at which his dreams fill themselves with a futile sense of pushing. The slow pace, the many stoppages, the sound of voices into the cause of which he is scarcely awake enough to inquire, combine to convey the impression that every official and servant of the road is lending muscle to assist the locomotive. An attempt to remove the baize with which the window is blinded for the night reveals nothing but outer darkness.
