CHAPTER XIII It was a sad little group of three who stood at the Bondurante gate watching the back of the carriage that carried the lovely little mistress of the manse away from them. Uncle Tom leaned heavily on his walkingcane, and only grunted his objections to the whole proceeding; while Clarisse, poor old soul, paying no heed to the great tears that coursed adown her fat cheeks, kept wiping her hands on her apron over and over again. Somehow, although she had heard absolutely nothing, she connected Babette s going away to teach with her own confession, and she blamed herself. If any one else, under the circumstances, had been betrayed into giving this testimony, even in the presence of death, she would have denounced her as unworthy the trust. And so now she denounced herself. This was why, instead of weeping tears of simple, unmixed sorrow over the final breaking up of the home, she stood remorsefully watching the receding carriage with quivering lips that tried to frame a prayer for many blessings to descend upon Mamzelle s head in compensation for the wrong she had done her. This was why she was heedless of her tear-stained face, and stood nervously expressing her powerless protest in her old way--wiping and wiping her hands. Noute leaned against the gate-post, his tearless eyes blinking suspiciously, until the carriage was nearly out of sight, and then, with a wild cry, as if of pain,...
