Not illustrated. 1851 Excerpt: .notice of the events which connect the lesson with the preceding one. This introduction might be profitably committed to the most advanced scholars, to prepare a short paper upon it, to be first submitted to the teacher for correction, and afterwards read by him to the class. This would have an improving effect upon the writers, and act as a stimulus to the other members of the class; there are several reasons, however, that induce us to recommend that the scholars should only in this manner take up the New Testament lessons. The next step will be the reading of the lesson; this the teacher will do well to commence, and take his turn with the scholars throughout. The moral effect of this will be good, and it will have a favourable influence on the reading of the class. The ability to read well is very...
