Dreaming Anarchy describes my fieldwork and theoretical reflection in the autumn of 2001 on a back-to-nature community occupying a Pyrenean village in Spanish Territory. The self-conscious methodology I adopted was to record and analyse my own dreams while in the community, using The Interpretation of Dreams as a toolbox. I hoped to observe not only the transition from English (and Scots) to Spanish (and Basque) but also the Gestalt of resistance and attraction to my self-definition as a member of the community. Using Freud s theory of everyday events stimulating appearances in dreams, my dream analysis necessarily includes substantial ethnographic material of a more traditional kind. Thus my ethnographic work, while not pretending to objectivity, highlights the selection of data and hypotheses which objective studies do not. My data is my dreams, a fitting form with which to study a utopia. Today, when the very ability to learn is so challenged by relentless social distraction and an educational focus solely on grades, my innovative methodology of mnemonic excellence, using dreams as sticky webs of meaning, may be of timely help. My hope is that people will be inspired by these reflections on a community where everyone worked, everyone was provided for and money hardly existed, where learning and teaching were as natural as the organic food and where global empathy inspired action that was truly local, and political ideology relationships that were truly personal. We, as I came to dream us, did not wait for a revolution in order to turn to each other, to turn back to the land, to turn our hands to tasks communal and individual with skills old and newly-learned. In doing so,...
