But whether the fixing be done by catgut, wire, metallic pegs, bone screws, dowels, or shoulder joining and fixing by screws or pegs, the fixation in permanent manner, by some method, becomes absolutely imperative where there is copious and deep discharge of pus and continued crepitus of the fragments on motion. DISCUSSION. Dr. Thompson: The treatment of compound fracture as given in the paper is certainlv commendable. If we followed it more frequently, we would have better results. Last spring I had a case of a compound fracture of the upper third of the thigh A brakeman fell off a rapidly running train and both legs were fractured: one at the ankle-joint and the other below the hip. I dressed the fracture of the thigh, which was compound, and I attempted to get union by the ordinarv means of extension on an inclined plane, but it was impossible to keep that upper fragment down; it would override the lower fragment in spite of anything I could do. After keeping him in bed for six weeks without union, I placed him in one of the pneumatic splints. Finally about seven weeks ago I had to cut down and wire the fragments together and at the present time I have good union....
