THE BONE CAVES OF THE ROCHES ROUGES: THE TROGLODYTES. FOR those who find pleasure in scientific observation, this district, with its mountain chains, affords a very varied and extensive field of geological research, within a narrow area. The general formation of the locality is limestone, stratified and unstratified, sometimes rich in nummulites and other fossils. This cretaceous stratum composes the higher as well as lower ranges, which at an interval of a few miles east and west of the Menton basin is flanked by a species of plum-pudding, or conglomerate, that shows in hilly masses at those points where the lessei Alpine spurs forming the amphitheatre break boldly on the coast. Nearly midway and close to the shore, in a terminal buttress of this unstratified bed, are situate the Bone Caves of these Roches Rouges, or red rocks. This is no...
